An Unfinished Journey

Have you ever been on a school trip? If yes, then you'll probably say that it's absolutely lame. But John Smith, a 10th grade student, will disagree with you.

His story started five months ago, on a windy day, just like all the October days in Minnesota. Mom kissed John a goodbye as he entered the bus that was supposed to take his class to Florida for a week. John took up his place and quickly fell asleep.

Suddenly, an ear-piercing shriek woke John up. As he opened his eyes, he realized that a tree fell on the front side of the bus. Panic started to fill his head, but when he started to scream with everybody else, he noticed a hand. It belonged to Mr. Tanks, the driver. Understanding that this could be very dangerous, and can cause an explosion, John told everybody his classmates to get out of the bus, while he started to remove save Mr. Tanks from the metal trap.

After an hour or so, the job was done. John sighed with relief when he saw that the driver was still alive. Somehow, he managed to get hit by a tree and still be so calm and responsible, first of all checking whether anybody else got hurt. Then he told John that he was a real hero, and after taking a quick meal, and constructing a sleigh for Mr. Tanks, the class headed out.

back to Minneapolis, making jokes and saying how great it is that they've all survived

After returning home and telling his parents what happened, ^{John} asked his dad a question that really bothered him. "We haven't even reached Florida, but I feel that this was still a great trip. How could this be?" After a minute of thinking, dad answered, "A journey is best measured in friends rather than miles."
