Close Friends and Far Islands.

punct.

It was an amazing day. The reason for that was simple. It was my birthday. I said to everyone whom I was going to invite on my birthday party that the best present was an adventure. So I definitely didn't have to be so surprised when my mother gifted me a mysterious ticket.

'It'll be a trip you'll never forget, my dear,' she said.

That's how my boyfriend and I appeared on the island in the middle of nowhere called Japan. Basically, it's a group of islands and we were going to visit them all. The thing is, I had always wanted to test my courage and make a long journey. That ^{was} what I called an adventure.

However, the real test for my courage was not the amount of miles but ~~the~~ the language. Both of us (me and my boyfriend) didn't know Japanese. So there appeared a problem: we had to enjoy our journey in the best way possible without speaking Japanese.

The silver lining in our gloomy situation were people. Even though we were speaking extremely different languages, we still were able to understand each other by using gestures.

Nevertheless, a disaster happened. We were talking to a shop assistant and he stubbornly couldn't understand what we meant! We were so desperate that we started speaking our own language.

'Oh, so you speak English. How can I help you?' he asked us.

His name was Tom. He was born in Japan but knew English so well! Turned out, he and his friends were interested in this language and organized a club. The rest of the journey we spent with the members of this club. gr

Thanks to Toma, we understood that a journey is best measured in friends than miles. 296
