A Helping Hand

Rebecca hasn't been to her hometown in years. She graduated, worked as a lawyer - all without seeing her family. Something always made her miss out on their Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners, on birthdays and road trips - She was always invested in herself. Putting her career first was Rebecca's golden rule, but now something deep in her core told her that it's time to repair those broken ties. alex

It was raining. Pouring, even. Rebecca hurried home with bags of groceries in hands, to the warmth and safety of her parents' house. She would surely be staying home until the weather calms down. Gr

However, not everyone could afford such luxury. Bewildered, Rebecca stopped right beside a girl selling her books and clothes.

"Why aren't you going home?", she said.

"I'm working, ma'am", said the girl. She lived in the house next door, and every day she was out on the street from early morning to late night doing every thing to earn something. Gr

"Do you need money this much?"
She did.

As it turned out, the girl's name was Elisabeth, and she was desperate. Her father died and left an enormous debt to her and her little sister. Elisabeth did all she could, but her earnings were never enough to pay off the debt. Now their house was about to be sold. 199

Rebecca couldn't care less, but something made her stay and listen, and meet Elisabeth the other day, and 240 many days after that, until she helped her win her case in court.

She got fired afterwards for staying long after her vacation ended. That didn't scare her anymore.

Gaining the courage to stand up for Elisabeth was more important. After all, a journey is best measured in friends rather than miles.
