The forest fairy

During my last year of college my friends and I decided to go on a car trip across the country. The goals of the trip were to test our survival skills and to relax after an exhausting semester.

The trip started out fairly normally, with one exception. The leader of our little group, Anthony, took it upon himself to drag us out of our houses in the middle of a thunderstorm.

Perhaps it isn't surprising that we ended up stranded in a forest without phone signal or physical maps.

Anthony's misplaced optimism didn't help in the slightest. "A journey is best measured in friends rather than miles", he said, trying to placate his furious friends. Seeing no other options, I volunteered to split off from the group to find the closest settlement while the other guys set up camp.

It must have been hours before I finally stumbled across a hut in a clearing. I rushed to the entrance and furiously banged on the door.

A frail-looking woman with beautiful blue and blond hair opened the door. "What brings you to my humble abode?", she asked me, while I stood dumbly, entranced by her looks. I stuttered out my response, all the while she stared at me with a playful expression.

"I see that you're in need of assistance! Why don't you hold onto me while I escort you and your companions out of my forest!", was her reply.

The world spun around me as I took her hand. Colours flooded my vision.

The next thing I know is that I was laying face up in front of my house, surrounded by my friends, our bags and both of our cars parked neatly in the driveway.

This was the best adventure I've ever had.
